this creek may therefore be imagined.

(From the St. Louis Republican, 25th.)

The whole of this section of country is suffering from a daily deluge. It rains every day, copiously, sometimes prodigiously hard. The ground is asturated with water. In many places nothing has deen done in the way of ploughing the ground for planting corn, or, if that has been done, the grains have rotted or been washed up, and all has to be done over again. The wheat, at one time so promising of a magnificent harvest, in many places looks as if it might be a failure. The grass crops can hardly be injured by wet weather. But, altogether, with heavy rains every day, and an advancing season, the prospect is gloomy enough. Unless there is a classe is a very little while, the whole prospect of the producer and consumer will be changed; the former will be able to get greatly enhanced prices for what he may have seved of last year's crop, without much prospect of smilining anything from the present one; and the latter will have to pay extravagant prices for whatever he may use.

Our river column tells all about the condition of the river here, as well as south of us. It can very modify up to Monday morning, when it may be presumed the water found its way to unusual places, and perhaps over the banks, and the rise was less rapid during year-aday. In the evening it was below the great overflow of 1844, by fourteen or fifteen feet, but nobody cares about making a comparison with that extraordinary flood, when so much damage was done in every quarter. It is hoped that a change in the weather will soon take place, and that the rivers will begin to recede.
